

Cape Coral High School Coach Walks Free After Inappropriately Texting Teenage Girls

Just a couple months ago, highschool coach Issac Harvin was accused of sending little girls sexually charged text messages. These messages included things such as “I can’t believe you can’t read between the lines,” and “Make sure you erase this message.” Both of which should be classified as extremely suspicious behavior, if not grounds for a firing already. No adult telling a minor to delete their private conversations has pure intentions, that just doesn’t happen.

Issac Harvin has also been accused by previous victims as having “eyed their body up and down” as well as having told them they “have a nice body.” Now these things happened during school hours, meaning the threat is not escaped in a public scenario, either. He preyed on the students on the track team, which he was the coach of, as well. One girl even had to leave the team due to his uncomfortable comments about her body. Did I mention he was the coach? The coach of a highschool track team was caught telling these things to teenagers, and he’s not in jail.

Sensing the commotion, the coward chose to resign before anyone could fire him. Obviously, just firing him wouldn’t have been enough. Sorry to disappoint, but I believe the ephebophile deserves a bit more than just a slap on the wrist. So, not a very happy ending. Nowadays he lives in Fort Myers, getting off seemingly scott free. You hear that? The literal child predator has not been charged for using real live children to soothe his sexual urges.

Now, a review of our clearly failing school system would be nice. How on Earth are such vile people able to, not only exist in our systems, but thrive in them? This problem runs deep in our society. It seems like every other day there's a new predator exposed for trying to diddle their students. Unfortunately, this is not an issue we can stop at full force. It is a systemic one, and unless we continue to call this out everytime it happens, and remind the world that it's not normal, nothing will change.
